[ 2019 ] Theory of Change: a framework to address social change

Reference: Bachelor's degree thesis - Facultad de ciencias sociales - UDELAR

Our contemporaneity faces multiple problems and challenges of different kinds that are not being able to adequately address through the traditional ways of approaching the problems, both with respect to their understanding, as well as the consequent social changes necessary to solve them. Given this, this document emphasizes, firstly, exploring the new frameworks for understanding social issues, especially through the perspectives of complexity, uncertainty, and divergence in relation to them; and secondly, consequently, emphasis will also be placed on how to address the social changes necessary to solve these problems through the Theory of Change approach, highlighting its different conceptualizations, elements and important issues related to it.

European political contemporaneity is strongly marked by the presence of various political actors who are emphatically oriented towards seeking institutional changes aimed at facing the multiple environmental problems in question. Thus, this work proposes to investigate and explore the institutional factors that explain the presence of these environmental actors at the European Union level; as well as try to classify them, see what methods of political action they have, what types of coalition they tend to form, and what are the types of institutional change that they try to promote. For this, reference will be made to multiple explanations related to different aspects of certain theories of institutional change that have to do with the political context and institutional characteristics; as well as to certain other different aspects of the theories related to means of activism and orientations towards the institutional system.
